Big dreams are ageless...

At a time when young people gather, often on social networks, around fleeting stars who last the time of a few thousand 'likes', it is surprising and delightful to see them celebrating a man who died more than three hundred years ago and whose dream still reaches them today. The dream of universal access to knowledge, of socialisation through school, of the conquest of autonomy that will enable them to succeed in life, of the faith that gives confidence and pushes people towards others...

Happy feast of St John Baptist de La Salle!

Of course, John Baptist de La Salle expressed all this in other words, but the reality that he helped to bring about is still so relevant today.

The celebrations of his feast day are not just a joyful opportunity to break away from the usual rhythm of classes: they are a way of reminding us that what is essential is what the school enables us to experience together: a fraternity that is a beacon for the future. And John Baptist de La Salle's dream has gone far beyond what he imagined. Today, with young people and adults of all languages and cultures in 80 countries, we are living this daydream.
